Teacher's Remarks:

Honduras still has many challenges to face in order to achieve the right to education. In this country run by Zelaya Rosales, primary education is not universal and many families continue to pay for their children's education. Only a small part of the population has access to secondary education. The number of illiterate people is very high and the Honduran indigenous population deserves special attention because, although they represent a 10% of the whole country's population, are usually excluded from official statistics. The education system is perceived as being corrupt and offers a low protection to teachers.
